Contrary to what we're often taught in school, the Japanese did not give up the use of firearms because they ended contact with the European nations. They were already making guns, for their own use and to export to China. Japanese flint-and-striker tobacco lighters may have inspired the use of a similar device in European firearms, although t

Giving Up the Gun: Japan s Reversion to the Sword, 1543-1879 (Boston: David R. Godine, 1979) Giving Up the Gun is not a martial arts story per se. This slim volume tells the true tale of how the Japanese adopted Western-style firearms for warfare in the 1500s, made wide use of them for about a century, then abandoned them in favor of the sword.

In talking to friends, he learned how the Tokugawas had - perhaps for the only time in human history - decided to give up a weapon of mass destruction, and they did it in part because they saw it as an evil, and a threat to their martial society.

Giving Up the Gun: Japan's Reversion to... book by Noel Perrin

Giving Up the Gun was and remains a significant work, in that it is the only English text devoted exclusively to why Japan, a country that had rapidly adopted and produced firearms in the second half of the sixteenth century, suddenly stopped firearm manufacturing and innovation in the seventeenth century.

The Decline of Japanese Firearm Manufacturing and ...

Firearms of Japan were introduced in the 13th century by the Chinese, but saw little use. Portuguese firearms were introduced in 1543, and intense development followed, with strong local manufacture during the period of conflicts of the late 16th century. H?jutsu, the art of gunnery, is the Japanese martial art dedicated to firearms usage.

successfully suppress firearms in Japan? No. Actually, they didn't. Many American believe they did because they've vaguely heard the argument of Noel Perrin's book Giving Up The Gun, explaining that the Tokugawa Shogunate successfully suppressed firearms in Japan, partly by promoting the cult of the sword. But the book was wrong.
